Robots all have some kind of mechanical construction, a frame, built up shape designed to achieve a particular task. For example, a robot designed to travel across heavy dirt or mud, might use caterpillar tracks. The mechanical aspect is usually the manufacturer's solution to completing the assigned task and dealing with the physics of the environment around it. Form follows function.

Robots have electrical components which sense and control the machine's actions. In a robot with caterpillar tracks, the electrical system is usually the motor's solution to completing the assigned task and dealing with the physics of the environment around it. Form follows function.

All robots contain some level of computer programming code. A program is how a robot decides when or how to do something. In the category of robots that needs to move across a terrain that may have the correct amount of friction from its battery, but would not go anywhere without a program telling it to move. Programs are mechanical and electrical components that are very good for it may not perform at all. The three different types of robotic programs:

remote control, artificial intelligence and hybrid. A robot with remote control programming has a preexisting set of commands that it will only perform if and when it receives a signal with a remote control. It is perhaps more appropriate to view devices controlled primarily by human commands as falling in the description of remote control rather than hybrid. They receive signals from a preexisting programming. Hybrid is a form of programming that incorporates both AI and remote control.
